Short film grants bc

There is a great opportunity in Canada to get film funding and grants for your feature films, documentaries and short films. There is no 1 right way to apply for funding in Canada. While Ontario and British Columbia are the two largest entertainment centers, there are opportunities in all provinces for funding that help filmmakers get their films developed, film (or TV series) shot, and even money for post-production and marketing. Below is a list of Canadian funding and grant organizations that help fund and support young and emerging, as well as experienced filmmakers to get their films funded and made.

Telefilm Telefilm has a feature film fund, a television fund and a new media fund. They also have other chapters, but these are the three most common. You can visit their website to download the guidelines for development, production and marketing. Telefilm is great because it is also very supportive of emerging artists. Canada Council for the Arts The Council of Canada for the Arts supports many arts businesses in Canada. They help fund everything from dance to theater and almost any other artistic endeavor that Canadian talent can conceptualize. However, they also have a film and video component to their organization. They provide research/creation grants, scriptwriting grants and production grants for filmmakers. Like Telefilm, the Council of Canada for the Arts also strongly supports emerging artists. They also place a high priority on innovation and artistic expression. BravoFact BravoFact is an organization to help Canadian talent. They help provide funding to filmmakers working on short films. BravoFact will help fund no more than 50% of the total cost of your productions budget to a maximum of $25,000. They don't fund documentaries. Again Bravo Fact has stated the importance of helping to support emerging artists in Canada. The Canadian Television Fund (CTF) The Canadian Television Fund (CTF) provides development funding for both the English and French TELEVISION series. As a general rule, when applying for funding from any of the sources mentioned above it is best to apply at the beginning of their financial year. That's when they have the most money at their disposal. It is also useful to apply at the end of their financial year. If they have any funds left over they will have to spend it on the or the agency runs the risk of not receiving funding from the government next year. Good luck with your film financing efforts! There are many different levels of public funding available to arts, culture and culture organizations and artists, as well as a wide range of private funding pathways. We have compiled a list of some of these sources; check back for updates.
